Lower life satisfaction among divorced people can lead to lower physical activity and increased smoking — two factors associated with early death, a new research has revealed.

Divorced participants were more likely than married participants to smoke and, as a result, had poorer lung function, which predicted early mortality, the study found.