Dementia can be predicted ten years in advance, according to a Danish study, which may help prevent the disease in high-risk individuals.

The study, published in the Canadian Medical Association Journal, provides 10-year absolute risk estimates for dementia specific to age, sex and common variation in the apolipoprotein E (APOE) gene.